

NAPOLEON BONAPARTE

IN NAPOLEON'S WORDS

Napoleon Bonaparte

In Napoleon's Words

Published by

MUSAICUM

Books

- Advanced Digital Solutions & High-Quality eBook
Formatting -

musaicumbooks@okpublishing.info

2021 OK Publishing

EAN 4066338115799

Table of Contents

INTRODUCTION.

BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH.

PART I. THE CAMPAIGN IN ITALY

Address to the Army at the Beginning of the Campaign, March, 1796.

Proclamation to the Army, May, 1796.

Letter to "the Directory," May 11 1796.

Letter to "the Directory," May 14 1796.

Proclamation to the Soldiers on Entering Milan, May 15, 1796.

Proclamation to the Troops on Entering Brescia, May 28, 1796.

Address to Soldiers During the Siege of Mantua, Nov. 6, 1796.

Address to the Troops on the Conclusion of the First Italian Campaign, March, 1797.

Address to the Genoese, 1797.

Extract from a Letter to the Directory, April, 1797.

Address to Soldiers after the Signing of the Treaty of Campo Formio, October, 1797.

Proclamation to the Cisalpine Republic, Nov. 17, 1797.

Proclamation on Leaving the Troops at Rastadt, November, 1797.

Address to the Citizens after the Signing of the Treaty of Campo Formio, Dec. 10, 1797.

PART II. THE EGYPTIAN EXPEDITION.

Proclamation to the Troops on Entering Toulon, May 9, 1798.

Address to the Military Commissioners, May 16, 1798.

Proclamation to the Troops on Embarking for Egypt, June, 1798.

Proclamation to the Egyptians, July, 1798.

Letter to "The Directory."

Order Respecting the Government of Egypt, July 27, 1798.

Letter to Tippoo Saib, Jan. 25, 1799.

Proclamation to the Army, on the Abandoning of the Siege of Acre, May, 1799.

Proclamation to the Army on his Departure for France, August, 1799.

PART III. NAPOLEON, FIRST CONSUL.

Proclamation to the French People, Nov. 10, 1799.

Proclamation to the Army of the East, November, 1799.

Proclamation to the French before the Second Italian Campaign.

Proclamation to the Soldiers before the Battle of Marengo, June, 1800.

Letter to the Emperor of Austria, on the Field of Marengo, June, 1800.

Order to Seize all English in France, Announced in the Moniteur, May, 1803.

PART IV. NAPOLEON, EMPEROR OF FRANCE.

Letter to the Pope, 1804.

Address to the Troops on Presenting the Colors, Dec. 3, 1804.

Letter to the King of England, Jan. 2, 1805.

Conversation with Decier Regarding the Marriage of Jerome Bonaparte, May 6, 1805.

Letter to Jerome Bonaparte, May 6, 1805.

Address to the Senate, 1805.

Proclamation to the Troops on the Commencement of the War of the Third Coalition, September, 1805.

Address to the Austrians, after the Fall of Ulm, October, 1805.

Address to the Troops after the War of the Third Coalition, October, 1805.

Proclamation to the Soldiers before the Battle of Austerlitz, Dec. 1, 1805.

Proclamation after the Battle of Austerlitz, Dec. 3, 1805.

Address to the Soldiers on the Signing of Peace with Austria, Dec. 26, 1805.

Proclamation to the Soldiers, February, 1806.

Address to the Senate on Annexation of the Cisalpine Republic, 1806.

To the Legislative Body before the Battle of Jena, October, 1806.

Address to the Captive Officers after the Battle of Jena, Oct. 15, 1806.

Proclamation to the Soldiers before Entering Warsaw, Jan. 1, 1807.

To the King of Prussia, Entreating Peace after the Battle of Eylau, February, 1807.

Address to the Army on its Return to Winter Quarters on the Vistula, 1807.

Proclamation to the Soldiers after the Battle of Friedland, June 24, 1807.

Letter to Champagny, Nov. 15, 1807.

Proclamation to the Spaniards on the Abdication of Charles IV., June 2, 1808.

Address to the Legislative Body, before Leaving Paris for the Spanish Campaign, 1808.

Letter to the Emperor of Austria, October, 1808.

Proclamation to the Soldiers, during the March for Spain, 1808.

Summons to M. de Morla to Surrender Madrid, Dec. 3, 1808.

Proclamation to the Spanish People, December, 1808.

Letter to the American Minister, Armstrong, 1809.

Proclamation to the Soldiers before the Battle of Eckmuhl, April, 1809.

Proclamation to the Troops at Ratisbon, April, 1809.

Address to the Troops on Entering Vienna, May, 1809.

Proclamation to the Hungarians, 1809.

PART V. THE FALL OF NAPOLEON.

Address to the Troops on the Beginning of the Russian Campaign, May, 1812.

Address to the Troops before the Battle of Borodino, Sept. 7, 1812.

Letter to Alexander I., Emperor of Russia.

Discourse at the Opening of the Legislative Body.

Address to the Legislative Body, December, 1813.

Address to the Guard, April 2, 1814.

Speech of Abdication, April 2, 1814.

Farewell to the Old Guard, April 20, 1814.

Proclamation to the French People on His Return from Elba, March 5, 1815.

Napoleon's Proclamation to the Army on His Return from Elba, March 5, 1815.

Proclamation on the Anniversary of the Battles of Marengo and Friedland, June 14, 1815.

Proclamation to the Belgians, June 17, 1815.

Napoleon's Proclamation to the French People on His Second Abdication, June 22, 1815.

Bonaparte's Protest, Written on Board the Bellerophon, August 4, 1815.

NAPOLEON'S WILL.

INTRODUCTION.

Table of Contents

The flash of Napoleon Bonaparte's sword so blinded men in his lifetime, and, indeed, long after, that they were unable to distinguish a second weapon in his hand.

The clearer vision which time and study bring have shown that he used words almost as effectively as the sword, and that throughout his career the address ably supported the military manœuvre.

The first complete demonstration of the elaborate use made by Napoleon of the address was the publication of the gigantic work known as the "Correspondance de Napoleon." Though the thirty-two ponderous volumes which form this magnus opus appeared nearly forty years ago, it is little known to general readers, its size and cost confining it to special libraries, and its documentary character repelling all but special students.

Yet it is only in these volumes that Napoleon's official life can be traced in detail from Toulon to St. Helena. Every document which he wrote relating to public affairs is—if we may believe the editors—printed in the collection. The number is enormous. When the commission appointed to collect the material began its labors, it found itself obliged to go through ten thousand volumes pertaining to Napoleon's life. The archives of Paris yielded forty thousand different documents of which he was the author, and the rulers of Austria, Bavaria, Hesse, Russia, Sardinia, and Wurtemberg sent contributions from their royal records.

Across the pages of the great tomes file the mighty procession of soldiers and generals, priests and cardinals, kings and peoples who, in the twenty years in which Napoleon was the preëminent figure of Europe, fell captive to his charms or his power. Here are the words by which he fired starving armies to battle, bullied obstinate powers to follow his plans, put hope into despot-ridden people, told kings their duties.

In these addresses one traces Napoleon's daily thought, so far as he cared to reveal it to others, watches the development of his plans and follows the gradual enlargement of his power. Nowhere else is there so fine an opportunity to observe the steady unfolding of his ambition for world-mastery, to see how he aspired to rule France, then her neighbors, then Europe, the Orient, America, the Isles of the sea. An especially curious study in connection with that of the evolution of his ambition is that of the methods he followed to enlist men in his stupendous undertakings. Such a study is possible only in the addresses.

The spell he exercised over the army is explained here, partially, at least. It was the custom to post the addresses through-out the ranks where each soldier could see and read them. The men had been accustomed at home to seeing all official communications from the Government to the people placed on the bill-boards, and so read them from habit. But Napoleon's bulletins, if they were posted in a familiar way, had a new character. He addressed the soldiers as if they were comrades, explaining the general