Locked in the indoor swimming pool

It was Saturday evening. Mark and I had both decided to visit the indoor pool near my apartment to relax and relieve the stress of the week. Mark held the door open for me and followed close behind as we walked into the pool. I stopped to admire the beauty of the indoor pool as it surpassed the image I had of it. The pool was almost silent except for a few shrill sounds coming from people playing in the pool, the almost inaudible pop song that filled the room, and the splashing of the water. The pool looked extremely large, with large glass windows on each side of the room, flowers arranged in vases and placed on tables. The tables each had two chairs. The doors had transparent panes that gave a view of the trees outside. The sunset reflected in the windows, giving the pool and pool a pinkish hue.

The pool was also large and clean, big enough for several people to sit in without bumping into each other, and the blue water looked appealing. Mark and I strolled around with our cocktails in hand while we looked for a place to sit and tried to decide what to do first, as we had numerous options. In one corner of the pool sat two ladies taking turns throwing water balloons at each other. In another corner, a middle-aged couple sat at the edge of the pool making out. I also observed that you could play volleyball in the pool, although no one was playing at the moment and the ball was floating aimlessly. While I took a sip of my cocktail, I thought about all the things we were going to do. This was going to be a wonderful evening, I thought to myself. I wore a pink v-neck bikini top and a matching pink high-waisted bikini bottom.
