Preface

As we approach the 100th anniversary of Emil Fischer's first synthesis of peptides, we bring together in a new presentation the wide variety of topics which demonstrate how far our field has grown and indicate the challenges that lie ahead. These five volumes cover the core of peptide and peptidomimetic chemistry and bring to peptide scientists, comprehensive and critical presentations in the Houben–Weyl tradition. Thus, the chapters are not encyclopedic, but rather focused on the most effective routes for peptide and peptidomimetic synthesis.

In 1974, Professor Erich Wünsch edited two Houben–Weyl volumes on the Synthesis of Peptides. That was a monumental undertaking and provided a resource widely used by chemists to prepare peptides and their derivatives with maximum attention to yield and purity of products. The current volumes continue these principles but encompass a much larger effort in the area of the organic chemistry of peptides and peptidomimetics. We as editors followed the Houben–Weyl concept of emphasizing protocols and reactions. Procedures for the often-used protections, deprotections, activations, and peptide and peptidomimetic bond formations remain the critical theme in all of the chapters. In addition, we make certain that there is a continuity that joins ongoing productivity in research to the accomplishments of the pioneers of our field. This format sets the stage for future scientists to undertake important research.

The founders of the field of peptide research paid great attention to methodology and isolation of products. The development of analytical and spectroscopic tools has enabled peptide scientists to create molecules of incredible variety and purity. Current researchers are in many ways mainly concerned with the interface between organic and biological chemistry. Thus, there is a strong emphasis on biologically interesting peptides and peptidomimetics in our volumes. However, the protocols and methodology covered in these volumes can also be applied to design novel materials, nanostructures, liquid crystals, and molecular sensors. Peptides and peptidomimetics represent structures applicable to broad vistas of molecular designs.

Recent developments in nucleic acids and protein sciences have allowed researchers to unravel the mechanisms of the biological action of many peptide ligands. As a consequence, many analogues and mimetics of natural ligands have been designed and synthesized. In these volumes we have paid substantial attention to these advances. With the exciting developments in genomics, proteomics, and pharmaconomics, the field of peptide and peptidomimetic research is expanding into new areas of molecular diversity. As a result, peptides remain a key component of the molecules of life.

The five volumes simultaneously represent a tribute to the pioneers in our field led by Emil Fischer and to the key figures who guided us more recently including Vincent du Vigneaud and Bruce Merrifield. We also acknowledge the hard work and creativity of all the scientists who have made substantial contributions to the chemistry of peptides and peptidomimetics. They are too numerous to name here. Nearly one hundred authors wrote chapters to create these volumes. Finally, the volumes are a challenge for future scientists to continue to make exciting discoveries as the new century unfolds.

The volumes are divided into sections covering a broad spectrum of reactions involved in peptide chemistry, synthesis of building blocks and target structures. Volume E 22a covers the protection of main-chain and side-chain functional groups, methods of peptide bond formation, and aspects of peptide synthesis in solution and on solid supports. Volume E 22b includes synthesis of large peptides and proteins. Specific methods are illustrated for the preparation of cysteine peptides, peptidomimetics, and conjugates such as glycopeptides, lipopeptides, phosphopeptides, and sulfated peptides. Cyclic peptides are extensively treated in this section. Volume E 22b concludes with a section on purification, analysis, and spectrometry of peptidic structures. Quality standards and comparative syntheses are also presented. Volume E 22c deals with peptidomimetic structures including side-chain-modified and main-chain-altered structures. In this volume, secondary structure inducing mimetics and scaffolds are treated. The synthesis of peptide nucleic acid (PNA) structures is also contained in this volume. Volume E 22d deals with de novo designed peptide-like molecules including template-assisted formation of helices, sheets, and loops. In addition, coiled coils are covered. Reactive peptides are presented. These molecules are composed of peptidic structures containing a wide variety of reactive groups for biologically important targets. The series concludes with a chapter on peptide natural products which are illustrative of nature's formulation of biologically active peptides and peptidomimetics. These are points of departure for peptide chemists to design and synthesize analogues and mimetics. The final volume of the series, E22e is an index volume containing an authors' index, substance index and preparation index.

This series on the synthetic aspects of peptides and peptidomimetics could not have come about without the dedication and commitment of my three coeditors, Arthur Felix, Luis Moroder, and Claudio Toniolo. Each brought a wealth of experience, insight, and knowledge to formulate the scope of the volumes and critically review each of the chapters. In addition, the coeditors and I wish to thank Dr. Guido F. Herrmann for his unflagging support throughout the project. The professional staff of Thieme, led by Dr. Fiona Shortt, have worked tirelessly to ensure that the volumes appear with great attention to detail consistent with the Houben–Weyl tradition.

As a final note, the success of this venture rests with you the scientists throughout the world. We will know if we have created a useful set of volumes by the attention paid to them. If we have succeeded, there can be no greater satisfaction.
