Preface

This is the fourth edition of The Law of Tax-Exempt Healthcare Organizations. The first edition was published in 1995 and featured a mere 680 pages. In this edition, we will be approaching twice that content. This seems a good opportunity to pause and reflect on what has transpired in the nonprofit healthcare sector over these past 17 years.

In our original edition, tax-exempt healthcare organizations and the IRS were focused on joint ventures with taxable entities; the creation of integrated delivery systems; the proper tax status for managed care organizations; and the appropriateness of providing benefits for the recruitment and retention of physicians. It is telling that the chapters describing these scenarios were among the least in need of revision for this edition.

At present, there are new developments occupying the attention of healthcare organizations and the IRS. These include health reform; the governance of healthcare organizations; the compensation of executives; the continued refinement of Form 990; and a host of new acronyms for their shared alphabet soup, including ACOs (accountable care organizations), RHIOs (regional health information organizations), and QNHIs (qualified nonprofit health insurance issuers).

Certainly the most dramatic development in the field of healthcare in 2012 was the U.S. Supreme Court's decision in National Federation of Independent Business v. Sebelius upholding most of the Affordable Care Act as constitutional. The Affordable Care Act has done much to impact the law of tax-exempt healthcare organizations. It established new requirements for qualification as a charitable hospital that are proactively focused on outreach, service, and billing and collection practices. On a broader level, by providing for insurance coverage for millions of Americans who previously had none and relied on charity, the Affordable Care Act brought into question for some the need to continue to provide tax exemption for nonprofit hospitals that will be providing less charity care. The Act also calls on the Internal Revenue Service to assist in the implementation of many of its provisions, a development sure to further drain the already limited resources of this agency.

In recent years, the IRS has renewed its efforts to oversee, monitor, make more transparent, and understand the nonprofit tax-exempt sector. This is evidenced in compliance check investigations, focused audit activity, Form 990 expansion, field guidance, and continuing education and outreach. The Service has taken a particular interest in nonprofit governance (and state attorneys general have converted that shared interest into action). As the IRS has stated many times, in its view a well-governed organization is a compliant organization. Much of its effort is on display in the Form 990, and its requests for governance information, under the mantra of transparency, often include the proviso that the form “requests information about policies not required by the Internal Revenue Code.” Still, as the Advisory Committee on Tax-Exempt and Government Entities (ACT) so aptly noted, the IRS can “drive behavior merely by asking about specific governance practices.”

There has clearly been a change during this period in the type of guidance used by the IRS for educational purposes in the tax-exempt healthcare sector. Lost to the dustbin of history are general counsel memoranda and continuing professional education texts. These forms of guidance were the primary means of communicating the IRS's analytical and policy positions throughout the 70s, 80s, and 90s. In the 2010s, they are virtually unheard of. Instead, the IRS uses its new tools of check sheets, staff memos, fact sheets, extensive substantive instructions for the Form 990, and website educational pieces.

An excellent example of the adage that everything old is new again is found in the Affordable Care Act and its accompanying guidance and proposed regulations. A central piece of the Clinton administration health reform proposal in 1994 for charitable hospitals involved the requirement of outreach into the community to determine health needs and devising a plan for meeting those needs. The Clinton health reform plan did not become law. Now, under the Affordable Care Act, charitable hospitals are required to undertake just such a community health needs assessment in order to continue to qualify as charitable tax-exempt organizations. It's déjà vu all over again.

This is also something of a turning point for our book. Over the course of three editions, the book has grown to exceed 1100 pages in length. In order to avoid the need to install wheels on the book in the fourth edition to ensure its continued portability, we have elected to move the tables and appendices of the book into our new companion website. (One of the authors was a bit slow to warm to the idea of moving content to the website instead of continuing to have it in the book. It was the younger of us; go figure. He has since come around and joined the twenty-first century.) The website will be an invaluable addition to the book and will also permit more recent developments to be brought to your attention in between editions and supplements. Meanwhile, the appearance of the book has changed, too. Our publisher, Wiley, has made a major commitment to the development of content for the growing nonprofit sector. The book is now part of the new Wiley Nonprofit Authority series and has been modernized. We hope you like it.

As always, we offer our sincere appreciation to Jennifer MacDonald, Claire New, and Susan McDermott at Wiley for their support, guidance, and patience, and our assistants Sharlaine Anapu and Cynthia Gurrola and our colleagues at Dentons and Polsinelli Shughart for their assistance and their wisdom.
